Me And My Friends (Are Lonely)

The night that Mike Wheeler disappeared from Hawkins was one that would be burned into the mind of young Will Byers for time and time to come. Their DnD campaign was going exceptionally well that night, when his mother told them to call quits and all head home. The last vivid memory he had of Mike was a kiss to rosy cheek, against biting cold and sway of trees. Mike never made it home that night, all but an echo of a plea for help falling on deaf ears, to sleepy kin and shadows against street lamps. His bike lay knocked over in the road, discovered by a cop on patrol the following morning. The big chemistry test was that day, but neither Lucas, Will or Dustin could focus, too wrought with worry for their friend. No one in their sleepy little town rested well that night, Will wrapped up in his mothers arms, fresh tears spilling down his cheeks. One day of searching turned into more, before days turned into weeks, weeks into months, and months into many more, to no avail. Those were the nights when Lucas and Dustin stayed home, gazing out bedroom windows to the stars, to try and catch a glimpse of freckles that dotted pale skin. When, by all holy figures, did Will miss the boy who snatched his heart with a wide grin and dorky sweaters, long fingers and dark, dark hair. That star fell, never to be seen again.
